My company has been slammed several times. Slamming is illegal. So why does the FCC let the slammer get paid for phone calls. It should be illegal for a slammer to get paid for calls that are a result of slamming.

In my opinion, the company that slams a telephone subscriber should be required to compensate the subscriber with a penalty that would be cost prohibitive. In other words make it so costly to the slammer that they wouldn't want to do it. I have been contacted by companies claiming to represent Bell Atlantic and then when questioned by me, (a retired Bell Atlantic employee) they finally fessed up to being with another company. I have asked Bell Atlantic not to switch me without contacting me personally. If I do get switched I think I should be paid for the trouble that they put me through in getting my carrier switched back. This whole situation is the result of the break up of the Bell System. When you've got the best phone system in the world, you don't dismantle it merely so someone else can get a slice of the pie. If you don't believe it, ask the citizens what they think. The courts blew this one!

I was slammed after I responded to a job advertisement in the paper.

I got no job, but the company did switch my long distance.

So I changed back to AT&T.

Then this company switched me back again... without my consent!
